I can confidently say that the few months I spent in France through the Erasmus program were one of the best periods of my life. Sciences Po is a new partner of Caucasus University, which meant I was among the first students who had the privilege of studying for one semester at this remarkable institution. For this opportunity, I am deeply grateful to Caucasus University.

Beyond meeting countless fascinating new people and creating precious memories, I gained invaluable experience of living independently. I became more closely acquainted not only with French culture but also with the cultures of various countries around the world, and I had the opportunity to share our own traditions and customs with fellow students.

I lived in Reims, a small, comfortable, and vibrant student city that completely won my heart within just a few months. This is the city where I made new friends, discovered beautiful places, and learned valuable life lessons.

This exchange program gave me an entirely new perspective, broadened my horizons, and strengthened my already established goals. The university had an incredible environment and, most importantly, atmosphere – every student was committed to showing their maximum potential. This naturally provided the motivation to become the best version of yourself.
