Within the Erasmus+ program, the semester I spent in Graz played a decisive role in my personal and academic development. Studying in a multicultural environment, with lecturers and students from diverse backgrounds and perspectives, became an opportunity for me to experience business theory in a real context.

Practical and interactive lectures, teamwork with international groups, and academic challenges helped me strengthen key skills essential in business: team management, strategic thinking, and effective communication.

My semester in Graz was not only about participating in classes and gaining knowledge — it was a period of daily discoveries, when I got to know myself anew. Independent living, taking full responsibility for my own decisions, and adapting to a foreign environment became my everyday reality — an experience that gave me greater confidence in my own abilities.

The most valuable part of this semester, without a doubt, were the people — students from all over the world, who quickly became a home for me in an unfamiliar city. The evenings spent together, shared joys, travels, small challenges, and sincere conversations had a much deeper impact on me than words could express. These connections taught me how everyday life can turn into an experience that remains part of you long after you leave.

For me, Graz is not simply a city where I spent one semester — it is the place where I gained knowledge, friendships, and experiences, where I found answers about myself, my goals, and the values that today define the direction of my path. The time I spent in Graz became the starting point of my vision, beliefs, and future.
