Tuscia / Italy

As part of the Erasmus + program, I had the opportunity, on behalf of the Caucasus School of Economics, to give lectures to Tuscia University students on Macroeconomic Policy Implementation Mechanisms and explain to them how this or that economic policy could affect their daily lives. The topic aroused great interest, which was reflected in the high involvement of students and discussions after the lectures.

It was interesting to meet with Georgian students on an exchange program at Tuscia University, to hear comparisons from them about Georgian and Italian teaching methods. Lecturing in a different environment was really a rewarding experience that will contribute to my academic development. In addition, opportunities for future cooperation between Tuscia University and Caucasus Universities were identified, which will further deepen the cooperation between the two universities.
